

POETRY

bodhidharma

the color of the room is a shade of blue called sleep. i'm waiting beside you like an oversoaked shirt losing color.

the doctor's rounds lynchpin the wheel i made long ago in a forgotten cave.

i thought it would halo me but its shadows on the chalkwhite wall showed nothing but a swollen, unbearable head.

i cling to the nurse's clipboard like a tick. somebody sends a word out about the winged veenas hanging from my bronchioles, about them lipping into flight. you turn over. my turn:

i cut off my eyelids and they drop like tealeaves in the boil, moving there like tectonic shadows on the milkwhite wall. i'll shroud you in an eyelid, tie it up with a lash like a wish, and take you away from the ghats of grief. you push me over but i won't fall asleep. i still make tea the way you taught me and it still tastes the way i want.

note: according to legends, bodhidharma was a buddhist monk who meditated for nine years inside a cave, gazing at the wall, saying nothing. in the seventh year, he fell asleep. angered, he cut off his eyelids. out of his eyelids emerged the first tea leaves.
