the lord cut her open
in a white coat

wanting nothing but legacy, on a bright Texas morning to remind us where the horizon lay. I was something small and alive — a heart.

no longer inside but always circling her, a new death for us both.

I forget that she lives, because in the dark I feel eyelids flutter shut the wood of flowers for the last time in the shadow the height of a breast, the sound of a breath coming unstuck, those little spirals of air. spirals meaning she forgets my name.

nothing. no specks in time. no alternate universes.
it doesn't matter what happens next,

a body is a border no matter what day was now, or then, it was simply a day, and neuron fire, I convince myself.

what happens next
is only life.
