

POETRY

Zhang Yu, 23, from China

by Bänoo Zan

"Zentangle 44, 2015" by Brigitte Thonhauser-Merk

You look sixteen —
are not fluent in Cantonese or Mandarin

Students take a long time translating my two-word questions for you

Your eyes are still lost

You don't bring lunch
Use every scrap of newspaper I bring to class

Still after two months
you can't answer this question, “How are you today?”

But you know
the language of smiles

I hear your parents sent you over so they can come after

They didn't give you a sharp mind

Now, like the gods of yesterday, they are withdrawing their love because you don't have what they haven't given you

After lunch break your head is on the desk

your ears pounding with music from the land
that rejected you

I see this is not new to you

Still I wish you could read this some day

to see that someone saw